Course Description
This course examines the changing nature of political authority in contemporary world politics. Drawing on what scholars have to say about international institutions and global governance, it asks critical questions with implications for global order, peace, prosperity, and democracy. To what extent has globalization undermined state sovereignty? Who manages global problems, and by what authority? Through what kinds of institutions and practices is the globalized world governed? Is global governance desirable, and what is its future? This course identifies the fundamental questions surrounding the politics and processes of global governance; places them in a modern historical context and analyzes within theoretical frameworks; and evaluates the desirability and progress of global governance in various issue areas.
