Course Description
This course explores the politics between actors with varying levels of environmental jurisdiction, including local/national/international actors, as well as environmental ideologies and theories of environmental equity and sustainability, and their implications for the present and future of natural resources and human society. The topics are as follows: materiality and perceptions of the ecological crisis, ideology and policy frames, the sustainable development narrative, alternatives–degrowth and sufficiency, ecological justice in a deeply unequal world, international regimes and their limits, global politics of biodiversity, conservation as a contested ground (CITES and whaling), politics of climate capitalism, global politics of consumption, global commodity chains and the environment (forest and timber), global trade and the environment.
