Course Description
This course provides a multidisciplinary examination of the key issues surrounding, and strategies for achieving, sustainable development. Organized around a series of core sustainability issues (for example food security, climate change, waste, consumption, and energy) the course explores how different perspectives (from sociology, geography, politics, international relations, social anthropology and so on) provide different interpretations and possible courses of action. Students will examine the sustainability of current social and political practices as well as the opportunities for change (on the local to global level).
