Course Description

This course explores key philosophical questions about consciousness as it relates to the world. It discusses the connection between intentionality and phenomenal consciousness, the relationship between object consciousness and self-consciousness, and the link between consciousness and the self. On the basis of central texts in contemporary theoretical and practical philosophy, as well as more historical texts in classical phenomenology, the course addresses questions of personal identity: how the self pertains to personal identity, the nature of personal identity over time, how persons persist despite undergoing physical and psychological changes, and the prudential and moral significance of personal identity. The course involves lectures, oral exercises, and group discussions.
