Course Description
This course teaches contemporary British cinema through the study of a range of films by British directors produced over the last twenty years. The course opens on the technical aspects of cinematic production and the basic principles of film theory and criticism. The films are studied in the chronological order of their production. In the study of individual films, students examine the stylistic features of particular directors' work, the national and cultural climate in which each film appeared, and the degree to which economic factors influenced the representation of national identity. Students also study other aspects of film production including casting, language, genre, narrative, and ideas of realism and comedy. Assessment is by an essay and a class presentation.
