Course Description
This course focuses on the intersections of political community and cultural pluralism in contemporary political theory, closely examining the interplay between the reality of multiculturalism and the theorization of political and civic solidarity. It discusses several prominent contributions to this subject, ranging from the 1980s to the present day, highlighting their strengths, weaknesses and the interactions between them. Each approach offers a different interpretation of this relationship and a different set of lessons to be learned in contemporary circumstances, whether the approach be Benjamin Barber's strong democracy, Iris Marion Young's concept of the city, David Miller's national identity, Will Kymlicka's liberal multiculturalism, or Bhikhu Parekh's intercultural dialogue.
