Course Description
Over the last two centuries, a new form of diplomacy has risen: culinary diplomacy, which consists in the institutionalized use of cuisine in international relations. Central and local governments – often in cooperation with the private sector, NGOs, and international organizations – are increasingly resorting to culinary creativity and traditions in their international relations for a multiplicity of purposes including: the improvement of cooperation;branding, economic and touristic promotion; conflict management and resolution. The course explores culinary diplomacy's scope and challenges, as well as its practical applications, through an overview of its theory, a selection of case studies and direct contributions from its protagonists.
