Course Description

This course looks at the principles of changing behavior from a process-based cognitive behavioral therapy and contextual behavioral science perspective. Key processes that result in behavior change are taught via experiential exercises and didactic teaching. Examples of processes are: positive reinforcement to increase behavior; acceptance of what we cannot control, and why it's important; cognitive defusion and looking at thoughts rather than from thoughts; perspective-taking and self awareness; mindfulness and why being here-and-now in the present is critical; and values, beliefs, and the goal setting and committed action towards living a life that matters.
