Course Description

This course provides understanding of the post-war political and economic development model in East Asia, the historical background and basic processes of the rise of East Asia, China's Reform and Opening Up policy and socialist modernization, and lays a solid foundation for studying East Asian problems. The course aims to comparatively analyze the political development of East Asian countries and regions, covering roughly the 10 ASEAN countries and China, Japan and Korea. The political development of East Asia is deeply influenced by domestic factors such as the socio-economic changes of various countries and the international factors such as the United State's East Asian policy and globalization. The course content includes the rise of East Asia and its historical and international background, the analysis of the economic and political culture of the East Asian development model, and the analysis of the political development of major countries and regions such as Taiwan, Japan, South Korea and Singapore.
