Course Description
This module charts the growth of mobile computing and addresses the ever changing technological landscape that influences interaction designs. With computing progressively moving away from the desktop (fixed) and into our everyday lives, activities, and environments (on the move), the course examines the changes and challenges for existing desktop-oriented evaluation methodologies and design practices; and investigate/discover/apply design innovations and interactions for mobile computing. Students in this course explore the theory and practice of such relevant concepts as situatedness, context, and mobile media in the context of designing for mobile platforms. At the end of this course, students can participate in the research agenda of designing for mobile interaction.
