Course Description
This seminar course gives an overview of how human culture has shaped and is shaped by the natural environment. It is a survey of overlapping key concepts and concerns in the social sciences with focus on anthropology and geography and environmental studies. Course topics include: mediating nature, population and scarcity markets and commodities, environmental ethics, risks and hazards in political economy, social constructions of nature, carbon dioxide and trees, wolves and uranium. The course provides an overview of the way social scientists, and anthropologists in particular, study the interaction between society and the natural world.
