Course Description

This course focuses on theories and empirical scientific findings that are key to the most recent developments in social and group psychology, and to the understanding of intragroup and intergroup dynamics in the real world. The concept of diversity guides the course and its main textbook. Course topics include the many facets of diversity and the possible threats to diversity, such as stereotypes, prejudice, stigma, and discrimination; applying concepts towards understanding actual intragroup and intergroup dynamics and interactions in societies; and promoting a critical debate on social issues associated with diversity, in particular ethnic diversity, in contemporary societies. The course discusses diversity and threats to diversity; theories of prejudice and prejudice reduction; social categorization and social identity; intergroup interactions, stigma, and discrimination; and diversity and power dynamics in societies. Basic knowledge of social psychology and psychometrics may be useful as a prerequisite.
