Course Description
Health policy is a core component of western welfare states. It is also a very complex and contested policy field where hierarchical, market, clan, and network based governance forms meet and sometimes conflict. A diverse range of national and international actors influence health policymaking. This seminar provides an introduction to comparative health policy analysis as a method for analyzing and comparing health systems. Nordic health systems are used as case examples, but comparisons are made to other types of health systems in Europe. Theories about comparative health policy, public administration, welfare states, and health economics are presented as frameworks for analyzing differences and similarities.
