Course Description
This course is about how the senses organize different dimensions of social life. How are race, gender, and class identities related to sensory perceptions? How do the senses shape power relations and knowledge production? In order to address these queries, the course interrogates how sensory experience lies beyond the realm of individual, physiological responses by analyzing a range of sensory faculties through cross-cultural comparative approaches. The course introduces key ideas in sensory scholarship and provides analytical tools to examine the senses in relation to selfhood and identity, urbanity, politics, religion, and heritage.
