Course Description
This course covers the history of Europe from the late 18th century through to 1991: from the French Revolution to the fall of the Soviet Union. The course examines social, cultural, economic, and political history, and the way these components have interacted. Lectures and seminars approach European history from a variety of angles. In chronological terms, the course highlights key moments in European history that had continental repercussions. In geographical terms, it explores the uses and the limits of dividing European history into histories of discrete nations and states. In thematic terms, the course examines the formation and evolution of various collective actors, such as religious communities, classes, sexes, professions, and generations, and considers how these groups have shaped and been shaped by historical change. In this option, students undertake the fall-term portion of the year-long course Europe From 1793 To 1991.
