Course Description
This course focuses on the essential role in edification that the President's biological body holds. The rhetoric using the body, or the values of the body, is a big part of the focus of this course. The course discusses how strength and power can be imbued in the presidential body, and also how the body can weaken. Examples are taken from the manliness of Theodore Roosevelt, the illness of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and the concealed disease of Ronald Reagan. The course allows students to question the presidential sacralization from another angle. The 2016 presidential election offers great insights for these issues.
