Course Description
This course investigates the emergence and development of the concept of self-determination, and examines its influence on the development and presence of the international system. The course discusses topics including the rapid development of self-determination following the end of the First World War and the Paris Peace Conference of 1919, self-determination and its effect on the creation and destruction of states including the redrawing of countries' borders in the twentieth century, self-determination and its ability to stabilize structures in international politics as well as question them and bring them down, and in the international system of the present, the course explores the idea of self-determination as a structural factor, and a risk factor, and how it underlies unresolved, potentially unsolvable problems.
