Course Description
This course introduces global political economy (GPE), its constitutive features, key concepts, institutions, and practices from an interdisciplinary social science perspective. Drawing on the literature from political science, economics, sociology, history and geography, distinctively global analytical approach to GPE spheres such as trade, finance, production, economic growth, development, environment, and technological change are presented. In order to understand past and topical issues across and within these spheres, concepts such as the state, the market, and the civil society, are not treated as isolated units of analysis, but as heterogeneous social forces that influence each other, and with that, produce power shifts and changes in the global economy, or maintain the status quo. This module teaches students to critically reflect the GPE on a sound conceptual and empirical basis, taking into account the strengths and weaknesses of the different explanatory approaches learned.
