Course Description
This course trains students to reflect critically on the historical, social, and cultural embeddedness of gender and sexual practices, relationships, and imaginaries in Europe and beyond. The focus is on the historical anthropology of gender and sexuality in contemporary societies. That is to say, on how gender and sexuality articulate with hierarchies of race, ethnicity, class, and cultural distinction – and the relationship between gender and sexuality, modern capitalism, and modern imperialism. Students engage with critical approaches to gender and sexuality in relation to globalization; the racialization of postcolonial immigrants, the emergence of increasingly multicultural societies, the advent of feminism and gay liberation, the relative progress in gender equality, and the diversification of gendered and sexual subcultures. Participants not only learn the latest theoretical developments in the fields of gender and sexuality, more crucially they gain knowledge about the social construction of gender and sexuality in contemporary societies. Prerequisite for this course is an introductory gender studies or diversity course.
