Course Description
This course explores key philosophical issues regarding the moral status of nature (individuals, species, and ecosystems) and whether this status differs substantially from the status of humans. The course discusses questions including what is nature, how do cultures understand or construe nature, and do humans see themselves as a part of nature or as apart from nature. The course emphasizes the significance of technology in shaping, both philosophically and pragmatically, society's relationship with nature. The course recommends students have completed an introductory philosophy course as a prerequisite.
