Course Description
This course examines the issues facing women in leadership positions and offers strategies for handling them. The course discuss topics including the issues and barriers facing women both in their desire to become leaders and once they become leaders, the effects of the media and social roles on women as leaders, whether or not women have a leadership advantage over men in the modern world, and the differences in leadership styles of men and women. Students investigate the history of the Czech Lands and its influence on the current status of Czech women as leaders, talk to a number of Czech women regarding their experiences with leadership, and cultivate an understanding to recognize when there is a gender dimension at play. Students review their own view and style of leadership and gain critical skills that they can use in their pursuit of leadership positions. The course requires that students have a basic understanding of psychology, interest in women's issues, and a willingness to interview locals for research purposes as prerequisites.
