Course Description
This course examines how knowledge and political power are connected in processes that take place both internally and between different types of organizations and sectors. The course covers formal and informal forms of politics in both private and public organizations and at all levels. Selected theories and empirical studies rooted in three branches of sociology are presented: organizational sociology, sociology of knowledge, and political sociology. In particular, the focus is on the thematic, analytical and empirical overlaps between the three branches and the concepts and phenomena at this intersection such as rationality, power, legitimacy, consensus, conflict, bureaucracy and democracy.
