Course Description
The course examines how the state, both national and local, has attempted to meet the challenge of urban growth during the 20th century. In place of a continuous narrative history, the course focuses on key events, projects, or texts to illustrate contemporary responses to the opportunities and problems created by the growth of the city. Using historical material drawn from a number of European and U.S. cities, it offers both an understanding of the forces that have shaped the current forms of cities in these countries and a vantage point from which to consider the problems now faced by cities in the developing world. This course is aimed at students from a variety of backgrounds – history, sociology, economics, geography, architecture – and encourages them to pool their specialist knowledge in order to develop a shared understanding of the play of such different forces that have shaped the 20th-century city.
