Course Description

This course studies the nature of peace and how it has been forged in African transitions from large-scale violence. The course examines what is meant by political change, and what kinds of such change are likely to come with violent conflicts and their termination. The political history of the area in focus, namely Sub-Saharan Africa, is introduced. Students further look at how transitions from violent conflict have unfolded in Africa in recent years, and what might explain different outcomes. Students examine how and why violent conflicts in Africa have ended, and how core dimensions of peacebuilding have played out. In light of this, the course assesses the regional capacities for addressing peace and security challenges, including by the African Union. Topics covered include: war and political change, politics and conflict in Sub-Saharan Africa, transitions from violent conflict in post-cold War Africa, conflict settlements and conflict resolution, security, power sharing, democratization, economic recovery, statehood and state capacity. Prerequisites for this course are an introductory to peace and conflict course and a course on political research methods.
