Course Description

This course explores human relationships with ecological and material environments. It examines diverse cultural perceptions of and approaches to the environment, the relationship between nature and culture, and anthropology's contribution to contemporary ecological and climate debates. While this course focuses on the New Zealand and Pacific region, it does incorporate a global perspective, using examples from around the world. Textual documents are used to present concepts and evidence, while visual media is used to present examples and topics of examination and discourse. Field trips are used as a practical way to apply the information discussed in this course.
