Course Description

This course covers family behaviors from a life-course perspective and an ecological system perspective. It introduces recent and hot research topics of family studies and provides a historical review on how family behaviors and policies change with the development of a society. The course provides an overview of theories, empirical research, research design, and methods under family sociology. The course follows a topic-specific and a case-specific approach to explore the diversity of life experience in the family sphere and the determinants of family behaviors. Topics include dating and mate selection, cohabitation and marriage, sexual life, parenting, work and life balance, gender and domestic work, break-up and divorce, intergenerational relationship, family policies, et cetera.
