Course Description
This class examines modern Japanese history, from the mid-Meiji period to the current day, from the 'margins' of history. The course uses primary source documents from suppressed voices, including political radicals, ethnic and cultural minorities, labor movements, feminist activists and others, while investigating the political and cultural contexts that lead to their marginalization and/or suppression. The course uses a variety of sources, not just history textbooks, as a means of telling and understanding history. The course also discusses the use of primary source documents, fiction, mass media, print culture, and visual culture in understanding and analyzing the past. Assessment: exam (30%), papers (30%), class participation (20%), presentation (20%)
