Course Description

This course introduces students to key concepts and ideas in the discipline of psychology. The course starts by investigating a brief history of psychology; learning about significant theorists and exploring psychological methods. It then investigate fundamental topics in psychology through four of the core perspectives in the field, namely: developmental, biological, social, and cognitive psychology. The course encourages students to begin to think about links between psychology and other related disciplines in the social sciences. Topics include: relationships, mental health, persuasion, identity, and parenting. The course draws on past experiments and theories from an array of global scholars, as well as real life examples, to demonstrate how relevant psychology is in our day-to-day lives.
