Course Description
This course examines how history can be used to address problems in the contemporary world. Students explore how knowledge about the past can be deployed to inform the development of policy responses to contemporary issues, such as the house-building crisis, or the organisation of grass-roots campaigns to save museums in the face of funding cuts. The course is delivered in conjunction with external guest speakers from sectors such as law, finance, marketing, media, NGOs, media, policy makers, government, and heritage.
