Course Description

Phonetics deals with the sounds of the spoken languages of the world. This course addresses the following questions: In human speech, how are sounds produced and perceived? How can they best be described and represented? How can one assess them better or differently through using computers? The course also includes practice in the production of a variety of sounds from different types of languages.

This course covers topics in phonetics, including but not limited to acoustic phonetics, articulatory phonetics and auditory phonetics. The course also introduces and analyzes segments and suprasegments of world languages with respect to theories of phonetics sciences.

Course Prerequisite: Introduction to Linguistics I and II, or consent of the instructor.
