Course Description
This course examines the creation of early modern texts c.1490-1603, focusing on the means by which texts in different genres communicate with the reader. It also seeks to create context through interdisciplinary material, especially in terms of science and philosophy. The course demonstrates the generic breadth of writing in this period, and the way in which the investigation and articulation of individual identity is informed by society, literature, and the sciences. What makes us what we are? What informs the ways in which we express ourselves?
