Course Description
The course examines the field of human mobility by following the trajectories of several interlinked journeys: from the forced movements of refugees into the world of labor migrants, political exiles, and immigrants. These diverse settings are explored through the lens of human mobility, thereby answering a number of key questions: Why do people move? What legal and political regimes govern, allow, and restrict these movements? How are mobility and inequality linked? How are refugees, migrants, immigrants, expats, nomads, and other "moving people" different from one another in practice, and in theory? Combining a close examination of concrete research with discussions of theoretical approaches, the course improves students' understanding of the subject while deepening their theoretical and methodological skills.
