Course Description
This course explores how religion shapes foreign policy, international relations, and global politics both at international as well as transnational levels. It examines the ways in which states, inter-governmental institutions, and global civil society organizations deal with issues such as religious pluralism, protection of religious freedom and religious minorities, individual and communitarian rights, sectarian politics, self-determination of ethno-religious communities, humanitarian interventions, and religious separatist movements. It also examines the salience of bottom up transnational religious mobilization, and case studies from across the world provide insights into religion as a source of conflict but also cooperation and peace-building. All of these and other topics are examined against the background of theoretical considerations informed by International Relations theory.
