Course Description

This course takes an archaeological perspective on Mediterranean societies from the emergence of the village and the conversion to a Neolithic form in the Middle East, through the changes in social structures at the end of the Bronze age. In this context, the course discusses the changes leading people to adopt a way of sedentary life and a production economy. The village life mode induces an increase in exchanges that take a place of increasing importance leading to the emergence of the city and the claim of social hierarchies, leading to the first empires. The course considers the impact of the exchanges in the structures of the Bronze Age societies in the Mediterranean basin and their visibilities in the archaeological field, particularly through the elite and hierarchical relationships.
