Course Description

Gender as socialization, as compared to sexual difference and the normal hierarchal system, is eminently political. The challenge it brings to the humanities and social sciences in general, to political science in particular, articulates in three analytical and chronological steps. The course looks at these steps, articulating them through disciplinary and conceptual introspection. After the course looks at the controversies concerning gender uses and political sciences as "normalization", students question the manner in which they focus on legitimate subjects, in particular by rereading the theories of contract, the public-private dichotomy, the policy/politics/polity, and the sex/race/class triptychs.
