Course Description
This course critically engages with theoretical, historical, and contemporary debates around "race," racism, and ethnicity. It examines the historical, social, and political context of race relations in contemporary societies. The primary focus is upon Britain, however international comparisons are made where relevant, including with the United States. Students develop an awareness of the ways in which "race," ethnicity, and racism interact with other social divisions and inequalities, and the ability to critically analyze the extent to which "race" and ethnicity are central to how society is organized and structured. Students also develop a knowledge of empirical and scholarly studies into "race" and ethnicity, and their relevance within a theoretical context.
