Course Description

This course covers the determinants, patterns, and effects of international trade within a general equilibrium framework, considering the interrelationships among product and factor markets in an economy. It explores how trade is affected by government policies and international trade agreements. It introduces basic analytical tools for evaluating the welfare and income distributional consequences of trade policies from both an industry and national perspective. The theories are related to current issues in international economics, such as globalization, regional trading blocs, and trade policies in Australia and the rest of the world.
