Course Description
This course covers a wide range of epistolary forms in the early modern world and encourages students to unfold the stories behind them, as well as to seek out their own examples of literary letters and place the canonical alongside the more obscure. The course is broadly designed to progress from real letters towards literary letters, but students are encouraged to experiment with literary, historical, and material methodologies throughout. Students have opportunities to learn about letters in a hands-on fashion, by physically manipulating paper, wax, and seals, and composing their own original "early modern" correspondence.
