Course Description
This course explores some of the politics that happens at sea. In particular the course focuses on the politics of fishing and marine renewable energy, and to a lesser extent on conflicts over marine natural resources, disputes on marine boundaries, and the role of the state as regards all matters of the sea. The course explores various theoretical perspectives, in particular an emerging literature which stresses the "social construction" of the sea, and the concept of "resilience." Students also examine methodological questions, or how we should study politics of the seas. Here the focus is on exploring to what extent qualitative ethnographic methods can help shed understanding and context on complex marine-based activities.
