Course Description
This course draws upon research linked to youth studies, sociology, criminology, psychology, and social policy. The course provides students with an in-depth, research-based understanding of youth, adolescence, and emerging adulthood. The course focuses on key theoretical approaches to understanding youth in society and considers a range of substantive issues and areas within contemporary research on both "mainstream" and "marginalized" youth, but with a strong emphasis on youth "at risk," including homeless youth, young people with care experience, and young people who use drugs. Varying approaches to the study of youth are reviewed and students explore how social and economic forces influence the lives and experiences of young people generally and marginalized youth in particular.
