Course Description
What is it like to be a child and grow up in Ireland today? What rights do children in Ireland have, and why do rights matter? This course addresses questions like these, and introduces some of the key issues relating to childhood and children's rights in Ireland and in comparison with other countries. Students examine the meaning of childhood from different perspectives; children as rights holders; and children's agency, participation, voice, and citizenship. Students critically reflect on their own beliefs and understandings of the status of children and young people and question the extent to which children's rights are realized in different settings and in different cultures and societies.
