Course Description

This course introduces key concepts affecting national education systems in the contemporary era of globalization. Since modern education systems were built by independent nation-states in the 19th and 20th centuries, the institutions that were created have come under severe strain by economic, social, technological, and demographic forces unleashed by 21st-century globalization. Governments everywhere are under pressure to prepare students for this new era. Students will be required to conduct their own research into aspects of globalization as they affect education in two or more nation-states. Each week, students will discuss a text about the topic of the week. One student will lead the discussion with a presentation, and then further materials and ideas will be presented to the students to challenge them to think as deeply as possible about the issues raised.
