Course Description

This class covers Mexican literature of the colonial period from the beginning of the 17th Century to the end of the 18th Century, providing a historical and critical overview of the literature that developed in New Spain during this period. Through the reading of representative texts (poetry, narratives, drama and essays), the course examines the principal characteristics of the literature of New Spain from Mannerism and the Baroque to neoclassicism. The course further identifies the most important characteristics of the diverse literary currents and genres of this period and the importance of the studied texts and authors in the history of Mexican literature. Topics and readings may vary by semester and course instructor.
