Course Description

In this course, undergraduates need to be proficient in the typical analytical model of crime and its variants, to be able to apply the criminological system to analyze teaching cases involving typical crimes, to be proficient in identifying the sentencing factors involved in teaching cases and simple real-world cases, and then to convict and sentence appropriately. In addition, undergraduates need to be able to skillfully identify the fundamental theoretical debates in criminology, grasp the academic controversies on the core issues and their unfolding, and be able to comment on these core academic controversies.

Given that this course is a required course for undergraduate majors, its primary goal is to strengthen the foundation of criminal law for students taking the course. Criminal law is a departmental jurisprudence with crime and punishment as its object, and is a normative discipline based on existing law. The study of crime and punishment can be divided into the study of general issues of crime and punishment and the study of specific crimes and their penalties according to the differences in the objects, which are respectively classified as Criminal Law I and Criminal Law II, corresponding to the General Provisions and Sub-Principles of the Criminal Law as legislation. Criminal Law I is mainly devoted to the study of criminal law, including the foundations of criminal law, the basic principles of criminal law, the interpretation of criminal law, the typical analytical model of crime (the system of criminology of the individual offender) and its variants (joint criminality, attempt, suspension, preparation, and competition).
