Course Description

This course provides a comprehensive introduction to the major traditions and key contributions in social theory in the context of the 19th and early 20th centuries. The strengths and limitations of various classical sociological perspectives are discussed and the direct contemporary relevance to social research are explored. Students are required to read the original writings of social theorists including, but not limited to, Karl Marx, Emile Durkheim, Max Weber, and Georg Simmel with the ultimate goal of developing their analytical skills and intellectual understanding of the classical theoretical debates in an informed and rigorous manner.
