Course Description
This is an interdisciplinary course on the environmental history of New Zealand, focusing on the interaction of humans and environment which has occurred since the arrival of humans about 800 years ago. This course starts with an exploration of the subject of environmental history and its global dimensions before moving on to the first Polynesian settlers of Aotaeroa and then moves on through the interactions of European settlers with the environment and expectations of contemporary New Zealand. Emphasis is placed on different perspectives of the various groups of settlers and users of natural resources.
