Course Description

The course deals with particular aspects of Egypt’s archaeology, history, and social history, from Prehistoric to Islamic periods. It draws on archaeological knowledge from the material remains, such as architecture, burials, and pottery in their social and archaeological context to reconstruct social and political history, development of hierarchy, power and ideology. Through Egyptology, it combines textual sources with material remains in the construction of various aspects of ancient culture: social and political history, art and architecture, and religion. The course also introduces the theory and methods of archaeology and Egyptology to discuss the sources of information and how they can be approached.
