Course Description
This course introduces students to the study of language as an interdisciplinary enterprise. By weaving together basic concepts from linguistics, psychology, neuroscience, language acquisition, and development, students become familiarized with a broad variety of topics ranging from the basic structure of the brain to theoretical and experimental issues in speech production and comprehension, and language impairment. Students are further introduced to the current issues in socio linguistics and theoretical linguistics, focusing on their relation to experimental research. Prerequisites for the course include at least one course on linguistics, cognitive neuroscience, or psychology.
