Course Description

This course introduces Japan's global political and security role, starting with pre-1945 and Cold War era legacies and then the Post-Cold-War era. It examines Japan's shift from security isolationism during the Cold War to security engagement; its championing of regional multilateralism in East Asia; its emergence as a global power in development aid, and its contributions to UN peacekeeping and non-traditional security in areas such as humanitarian and disaster relief (HaDR), counter-piracy, maritime security, and counter-pandemic measures. This course focuses on Japan's relationships with the US, China, Korea, ASEAN, and Europe, and considers how Japan's foreign policy institutions, including those making security and development aid policy, have changed during the Abe administration. The course concludes with a summary looking at Japan's trajectory as a middle power.
