Course Description

The course looks at the global Indo-Pacific system, area ,and politics. The Indo-Pacific space has both a geographical dimension and a geostrategic dimension. As a geographical object, this area refers to the vast sea area stretching from the South China Sea to East Africa, through the Pacific Ocean, Southeast Asia, the Indian Ocean and the shores of East Africa. As a geostrategic object, Indo-Pacific must be understood as the expression of an objective alliance of regional powers (Australia, India, Japan, New Zealand) seeking to promote alternatives to the Belt and Road Initiative, both in the Indian and Pacific oceans and on the Asian and African continents where China is present. As a political object, what is the name Indopacific? The course questions these different representations of space, their political use, and the related cooperation policies, at the intersection of military and development issues.
